

November Luncheon on Taliesin Preservation

The luncheon series continues in November with a talk from Carrie Rodamaker, Executive Director from the Taliesin Preservation organization in Spring Green WI. Taliesin was the last of noted architect Frank Lloyd Wright's homes. It's studio, and garden sanctuary was a laboratory for architecture and design and became a base for much of his notable work.

Involved with Taliesin Preservation for 17 years, Carrie has worked within multiple departments, gaining a full understanding of the intricate operations within the organization. In December of 2015, she began her role as Executive Director. Taliesin Preservation's dual mission is to preserve the cultural, built and natural environments that comprise the Taliesin property and to conduct public educational and cultural programming that provides a greater understanding of Frank Lloyd Wright's architecture and ideas. Taliesin Preservation works in partnership with the Frank Lloyd Wright Foundation, based in Scottsdale, AZ, to preserve Wright's 800-acre personal estate.

Wright's architecture needs no introduction, as it surrounds us in the Chicago Area; some for over 100 years. Join us for an interesting review of this topic. The reservation line is open.

October Luncheon Featured Mt. Rushmore

We had a light attendance for October, but those who came were entertained with a unique perspective on the artist and sculptor Gutzon Borglum and his contributions and controversies. Thanks to Jim Weren or Naperville, who led the talk. Thanks also to Sam Smith, who led the meeting as Torskemaster.

Things, from the Old Norse þing, are the early assemblies found throughout Northern Europe as a result of our shared Norse heritage.

Gulatinget Millennium Park in Norway is a symbolic thing site opened in 2005 to commemorate the annual parliamentary assembly which took place in Gulen from approximately 900-1300 AD.

They have been described as the Viking cradle of democracy because their establishment was an early attempt to introduce a representative system, allowing disputes to be settled in a neutral forum rather than by blood feud and violence alone.

The importance and success of the system led to it being transported from the Scandinavian homelands to Viking colonies throughout Northern Europe. We can identify many sites by their thing, ting, ding or fing place names. Some examples include Gulating (Norway), Tingwalla (Sweden), Þingvellir (Iceland), Tinganes (Faroe Islands), Tingwall (Shetland and Orkney), Dingwall (Scotland), Tynwald (Isle of Man) and Fingay Hill (England).

When the Vikings and early Norse settlers arrived in a new place they brought with them their customs and legal systems. Political decisions were made at the thing, laws upheld and disputes settled. Proceedings were overseen by the local ruler and the law-speaker (judge), whose job was to memorize and recite the law. At some things, known as Althings, any free man was entitled to vote. At others - Lawthings - the crown and local communities acted together to interpret the law.

The thing was also a focus for religious activity, as well as trade and exchange. At Thingvellir in Iceland you can still see the remains of the booths, or huts, where traders came to do business with people attending the meeting.

The thing system for sharing and legislating power can still be recognized today. Several things continue to be active. The Icelandic parliament is still known as the Althing, the Norwegian parliament is called the Storting and the Faroese parliament goes by the name of Løgting. The Manx parliament, known as Tynwald, still holds a midsummer court on the thing mound at Tynwald Hill every year.

Today, at a time of increasing internationalization and globalization, the thing story is a reminder of an age-old need for robust legal systems and open debate, and the importance of trying to resolve conflicts without resorting to violence.—from “What is a Thing?” at www.thingsites.com
